Students learn fractions with iPod app from Virginia Tech

Fifth grade Floyd Elementary teacher Jennifer Davis knows how to get a fifth graders attention: candy! Mrs. Davis's class recently took part in a research study with Virginia Tech on their new math app "Candy Factory."

A team of Virginia Tech researchers have developed a highly successful educational software application (app) for math called "Candy Factory." It is designed to teach fractions concepts to middle-school students.

Students experienced varying emotions while playing the game, from awe and engagement to frustration to success. "The students were thrilled to be able to participate in the study. They were over-the-moon to use the iPods, technology is magic when it comes to engagement, not only were they engaged but it was a great learning tool. They were a part of something few are able to be a part of and got a great app for our school and learned a lot about fractions along the way," Davis commented.

"Candy Factory" consists of three game levels that challenge students to build a stronger understanding of proper and improper fractions. The game is based around a candy manufacturing factory where students must satisfy a customer's order for a candy bar of a particular size.

"We are very fortunate to have a great resource just down the road with Virginia Tech and appreciate being able to collaborate with researchers in an effort to help students succeed," said Director of Technology Mike Murphy. "Virginia Tech and the development of this iPod app are part of the leading edge of educational technology. To have this resource available for our students is outstanding."

"Candy Factory" is available at the iTunes store for no cost to teachers worldwide. Researchers say one of the most intriguing things about the "Candy Factory" app is that it actually copies the mental actions it takes for students to figure out fractions. The app has recorded over 2,000 downloads in about one month
